300 Years Ago

Two years before his death, Sir John Harvey took the charge of the family affairs at the death of his first wife, and it was his last will and testament that served as a model for the first will of any family in England.

In the will, he left a large bequest to his son, who was to receive the sum of £2,000, but only after he had obtained a university degree. He also bequeathed a considerable sum to his daughter Mary, who was to inherit £1,000 if she married within the year. The will was signed in the presence of witnesses, and was witnessed by the notary public.

The will was then presented to the court of probate, and was accepted as a valid document.

From this time on, the family lineage of the Harveys became well known, and their contributions to society were recognized. The Harveys were known for their generosity and their charitable works, and their legacy continues to this day.
