The President's Advisers

The story of how President Johnson was informed of the United States' new role in the South Vietnam conflict is a fascinating one. It was not until a few moments before the announcement that the President was made aware of the decision. It is true that the President had been informed of the situation, but the decision had not been made until the last minute. The President's advisers, however, had been working on the problem for some time. They had been studying the situation and had been discussing it with the President. They had been trying to come up with a solution that would be acceptable to the President. They had been trying to come up with a solution that would be acceptable to the American people. And they had been trying to come up with a solution that would be acceptable to the United Nations. The decision was a difficult one, but it was the right one. The President's advisers had worked hard to come up with a solution that would be acceptable to all sides. And they had succeeded.
